Magix Video deluxe 2007 Premium Plus. T-cell receptors (TCRs) mediate the cell-mediated host immune response to infection and cancer. TCR expression is tightly regulated at the transcriptional and protein levels. We have developed real-time RNA FISH (RTF-FISH) technology to simultaneously visualize the transcriptional and translational state of a given cell and to measure the kinetics of such regulation. Since its inception in 2005, the technology has been adapted to address essential aspects of T cell biology: analysis of the gene-specific, transcriptional and translational regulation of HIV-1, identification and analysis of the kinetics of HIV-1 early-stage RNA transcripts and kinetics of protein translation. The technology, which is suitable for in situ and single-cell applications, is based on the incorporation of high-affinity DNA-RNA FISH probes that are designed to closely match the mRNA sequences of interest. Probes are detected in living cells using a commercial confocal microscope and the detected transcripts are visualized in situ. Although the technology does not require enzymatic amplification or pretreatment, total RNA is required. Since our group uses single-cell quantitative PCR to identify RNA transcripts in situ, we can also monitor the entire population of cells simultaneously to quantify the ratios of each mRNA species present in individual cells. By combination with microfluidics-based single-cell sorting, RTF-FISH permits real-time, end-to-end analysis of the regulation of virus translation in living cells. We present data demonstrating that RTF-FISH provides a novel tool for visualizing the kinetics of HIV-1 gene expression and translation, for determining how the transcriptional and translational regulation of viruses in T cells is influenced by agonists and inhibitors, and for identifying the mechanism of action of compounds that target HIV-1. We have tested our ability to detect virus gene products and to map the location of newly synthesized proteins in HIV-infected cells in the presence of antiviral drugs. We have demonstrated that quantitative analysis of the translation of full-length Gag in living cells can be used to detect inhibitors of HIV-1 replication and to map the location of the protein on the plasma membrane of infected cells. We have also demonstrated that we can detect the expression of endogeneous cellular
