Organization of a Photoshop Project

As with all types of projects, a good
project plan will help
you stay on top of all the details. In

Photoshop, organize your projects by layer.

You will first create an image or layer, make adjustments, and then save that layer as a new image with a new file name.

This allows you to change your mind if needed later. Your Photoshop projects can be broken into two kinds: •

*Exploratory
projects:* You will get the job done
without minding the details. The result
looks great, but who wants to stress about
details like fixing a
minor blur or the
width and length of

your image? •

*Composite

projects: You will get the job done more carefully to ensure that it is consistent with your overall branding. Your image is not necessarily refined to completion. You are still editing and making changes.

TIP Don't start a project unless you plan to complete it. You'll most likely end up starting something new or fixing something else—so let's get started!_

including High
Dynamic Range
(HDR) and Cartoon.

Q: Changing a div's color on mouseover I need to change the css background color on mouseover in the same way as a banner, and then revert back on mouseout. The only way I could figure out how to do this is by recording a keyframe animation and then looping it, but I want to know how to do it with just css and jQuery.

Thanks for any help!

A: This should do it with plain CSS: If you want to animate it: div { background: red; border: 1px solid

black; color: white;
transition: 1s; -webkit-
transition: 1s; -moz-
transition: 1s; -o-
transition: 1s; }

div:hover { color: red;
} jsFiddle example x )

$= 3 * x + 10$. Let f be a function $f(x) = 3x + 10$. Let g be a function $g(x) = (-68) / (-51) / (12/9)$. What is the smallest value of $f(g(x))$?

What's New In?

“Although there are times when I’m sitting at a Starbucks, enjoying coffee and a napkin, that’s not necessarily where I’ll be the next day,” says

Jane Grumet, the president of Grumet Communications, an ad agency that became famous for managing Hillary Clinton's image in 2016. To avoid the perception that the agency offered lukewarm support for Clinton, the company decided that the best way to communicate Grumet's enthusiasm for the former secretary of state was by showing her in positive, powerful situations. In some cases, the headlines from the agency's largest consumer projects were "Hillary

Clinton is here” or “Superhero Hillary.”
For Sanders, Grumet
did a photo shoot that sought to put an image
of victory in Sanders’s corner. At the end of the 2016
campaign, the debate
over how much of a
business the Republican National

Committee should be in supporting the party's candidate heated up. The RNC now requires major RNC donors to pledge never to do business with Trump-connected firms. Even so, not all Republicans are as keen on trading Trump for Hillary. "I think it's a big mistake," says Rich Beeson, former campaign chairman of the Ohio Republican Party. After the campaign was over, the RNC moved to actively distance itself from Trump's most negative campaign messages. The party asked vendors like Grumet to take a second look at negative images they had produced. “It can be challenging in a world where Trump-related companies are thriving. You might be unaware that Trump has expanded into the hotel sector,” Grumet says. Still, it's hard to anticipate negative results for a business that's been in the president's corner. In the battleground states that helped elect Trump—Ohio, Michigan and Pennsylvania—Grumet is part of a new-media company that is producing more video to be consumed on the platforms that are mostly controlled by Facebook and Google. (The company was founded by Colbert Report colleague Jordan Sargent). When Republicans are on the ballot in November, Grumet’s team will produce videos aimed at mobilizing Ohio voters for a re-election message that looks much like the ones that delivered Trump to the White House. “For the most part, Republicans are about the same,
