High tech. "Hey," says Sandy, the employee standing nearby. "That thing is really loud!" "It's off," Sandy says, pointing to the "off" switch on the side of the fan. But it's too late. The fan continues to blast, with a ferocity that is powerful enough to make a nearby phone booth ring like a church bell. The device, called a geophone, is used to get readings of underground structures like gas lines and water
