Raw semen processing Raw semen processing is the procedure by which semen is prepared for artificial insemination of an animal. Assisted reproductive technologies Raw semen has been used by breeders in assisted reproductive technologies such as artificial insemination, intracytoplasmic sperm injection and somatic cell nuclear transfer. Traditionally raw semen is processed by liquefaction and motility selection. The spermatozoa are then washed in an isotonic and hyaluronidase-containing solution to remove seminal plasma, filter out residual seminal fluid, and disperse the spermatozoa. The sperm are then placed in a straw or other container in semen collection bags. Any residual fluid in the semen collection bags is then removed. The sperm are then diluted in a diluent (usually a wet extender solution with egg yolk) and centrifuged for 10-15 minutes to separate the liquid portion and then reconcentrate the liquid portion for injection. Once spermatozoa are concentrated, the spermatozoa need to be stored at refrigerated temperatures until time for use. Various methods have been used to store spermatozoa including storing them at 4°C (39.2°F) in the collection bags in the refrigerator, refrigerating in a liquid fume hood at 4°C or freeze-storing at in liquid nitrogen vapor phase. Although these methods allow spermatozoa to be stored at standard refrigerated temperatures, each has its own disadvantages. Since sperm are extremely sensitive to even small changes in temperature, the freezing step is relatively hazardous, as cells are quite fragile. Liquid nitrogen vapor phase storage requires sophisticated equipment

Tyler Tavey, 19, made the call to the Rockingham Police Department claiming that his mother had locked herself out of the house with her keys and had been shot while walking home from the train station. Detective Senior Sergeant Nick Tate told a Rockingham Magistrates Court in South Australia that Tavey was in his 2012 silver Holden VE Commodore when he made the call and that he had a .32 calibre revolver in his pocket. "He gave a fictitious name and claimed his mother was shot and had locked herself out of the house with her keys," Detective Senior Sergeant Nick Tate said. "It was a hoax call for personal gain." Tate said Tavey travelled about 10km before he called police. Police arrived and discovered the revolver, a magazine and 12.22 rimfire rounds, and Tavey was charged with false reports to police and possessing a prohibited firearm. Magistrate Grant Herston said he could not help feeling sorry for Tavey. "He's just a kid and he's obviously made a mistake," Magistrate Herston said. "You're going to be punished severely but it is the first time I've felt I'd like to give the kid any credit for taking responsibility, even though he's only 19." Fracking, the controversial process by which injected fluids rupture the rock layer below the Earth's surface to extract natural gas, is now an established method in the US. But for many environmental groups, the energy source represents a dangerous environmental threat and has thus led to several unsuccessful legal challenges in the courts. Perhaps the most high profile, such as that of activist Erin Brockovich, has led to fracturing companies and the US government to
