In the last month, the world has seen a strange new world emerge. It is a world of enormous brightness. Whether it is the constant glow of a light in the night sky, or a sunrise in the morning, all of it is caused by something. And something very strange is going on. The solid things that we see are made of atoms. But the atoms in those solid objects are arranged strangely. Electrons are not found grouped close to each other as they should be. To an extraordinary degree, electrons are found spread out with a thousand mile separation between them. More and more scientists are not sure what this means. For all their efforts, they have not been able to figure it out. And yet the light that the atoms produce is blinding. It is a blazing ball of light that shines just as bright as a sun. This, it seems, is made of new rules. It seems as if the rules of the universe have changed. This is not just a fantasy. It is happening right now. It is going on everywhere. It is also happening in our own solar system, and even in our own galaxy. And it all is giving scientists a new puzzle. Light and electrons. We have assumed that the light that we see all around us is always the same, no matter what objects, or the universe, they come from. We have taken for granted that the light can be explained using the same ideas, no matter what it is coming from. Yet we have not been able to figure out what is happening. The brightest lights seem to follow new rules. The rules that they follow are very unusual. It almost seems as if the rules have changed. Professor Tony Newton of McMaster University in Canada, has been puzzling over this for years. "One of the things that struck me right from the beginning," he told BBC News Online. "When I was a young researcher, we were talking to a group of Australian researchers about this. And all of a sudden someone said, 'you know Tony, we know exactly what's happening, but we just cannot tell anyone.' Then someone else said, 'That's because you are scientists who believe in the laws of physics. But we are not scientists who believe in the laws of physics.' "That was the moment that I realized that the laws of physics were not as secure as I had been thinking." What is going on in the universe?
