The charge-carrier recombination lifetime in thick gallium arsenide layers on indium phosphide. The charge carrier recombination lifetime in thick gallium arsenide (GaAs) layers on indium phosphide (InP) has been investigated by the transient photovoltage (TPV) technique. The GaAs/InP interface, containing a high density of interface states in the valence band of the InP substrate, induces the observation of a biexponential TPV decay with a fast time constant of 200 ps and a slow time constant of about 2 ns. This fast and slow recombination processes appear as a rapid rise and a slower decay in the transient photovoltage response after the excitation, respectively. It is interesting to notice that an efficient photoexcitation of the carriers in the n-GaAs layer is necessary for the observation of the fast recombination process in this case. Moreover, the results suggest that both the fast and slow recombination processes are located at the GaAs/InP interface. This conclusion is supported by the TPV measurements on a sample with the InP substrate ex situ etched and the GaAs layer layer thinned down to 200 nm. The fast recombination time constant is independent of the thickness of the GaAs layer and is found to be similar to the one for the slow recombination process.
