In reference to we know the nearest edge of the galaxy is at 4,200 light-years from Earth and the farthest edge is at 4.5 billion light-years. If we knew that stars, planets, and (possibly) habitable planets orbit the center of the galaxy (meaning that while we know the approximate distance to the center, we don't know the exact distance), how far would we have to go to find it? It seems like the more distant the center, the greater the red-shift we'd need to see for it. Perhaps the answer is related to the Doppler effect, in which doppler shift is proportional to velocity (v) and inversely proportional to distance (r). In this case, the velocity of the stars is zero but the distance to the center is only vaguely known, so what distance do you need to go to see 4.5 billion light-years? 1 billion light-years? 100 million light-years? 100,000,000 light-years? If my math is off, please let me know. A: In principle, I think if we know d , we can measure the redshift z of its light as $z =$

The state government has announced a $12.4 billion mining project that could one day produce almost half the world's lithium, worth some $1.3 billion, has been given the green light. Western Australia was one of the first states to develop reserves of lithium, and the state is now considered one of the world's main production areas, according to mineral analyst Peter Kelly. "The big, big price-driver is Australia. If we can get the price of lithium here down to a place where it's no longer out of reach of Australian companies, it's a big game-changer," Mr Kelly told AAP. Mines Minister Andrew Pitcher, who announced the new development of the Menzies project in the state's Goldfields-Esperance region, said the licences issued cover 5.2 billion tonnes of underground reserves and 2.85 billion tonnes of carbonate resources, making it the largest Australian lithium reserve. The project was approved in August but was suspended while mining was conducted on the license, the Mines Minister said. HIV-1 tat protein enhances the expression of interleukin-6 in human proximal tubular cells. To determine whether HIV-1 tat protein affects the expression of interleukin (IL)-6 in human proximal tubular cells (hPT). IL-6 expression was analyzed by Northern hybridization analysis, enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) and immunofluorescence. Cultures of hPT were stimulated with tat protein, IL-1 beta, IL-1 + tat or IL-1 + tat + IL-6 antisense oligodeoxynucleotides (ODNs).

IL-6 mRNA levels were determined by Northern hybridization analysis. The production of IL-6 was evaluated by Western immunoblotting.

Immunofluorescence analysis and ELISA were used to determine the immunolocalization and secretion of IL-6.
